Additional notes

The woman must receive information as part of the provision of information during the process of giving informed consent, including information related to "physical and psychological risks" associated with abortion, "the current development stage of the embryo or fetus," and "alternatives to abortion" such as adoption and support in pregnancy from civic and religious organizations. The woman does not have the option of refusing to be given this information.

Women seeking abortion on request must also be provided with the required information in writing. A model for this written information is provided by the Ministry of Health, which suggests that written information on the risks of induced abortion should outline among other things that "[t]he subsequent impaired ability or inability to become pregnant cannot be ruled out," and that "[f]ollowing the induced termination of pregnancy, a woman may experience feelings of anxiety, guilt, sadness and depression." This information provided should also include written information on the stage of fetal development, which the Ministry of Health specifies as information on "the result of the ultrasound examination, the length of pregnancy, and the development stage of the embryo or fetus."

The Code of Ethics of a Health Practitioner allows individual health professionals to refuse to provide any medical service if performing the service “contradicts [their] conscience,” except in situations posing an immediate threat to the life or health of a person.

If a health care provider refuses to provide health care, the Act on Health Care entitles the patient to file a complaint to a regional self-governing body which is responsible for reviewing the complaint and identifying a provider who will provide the service and who is not located too far away from the person’s residence or work.
