Additional notes

The 2021 judgement struck down the phrase "who suffers from mental disability" in Article 150 of the Penal Code, thus saying that consensual abortions in cases of rape could not be penalised under Article 149 for all women, not just those with a "mental disability". The court also asked the legislature to "create an appropriate regulatory framework governing consensual abortion in the event of rape" and included some guidance and timeline for this regulation.

Additional notes

The guidelines state that the health service should advise the legal representative of the importance of reporting rape in order to protect the woman. But a police or judicial report is not a requirement to access abortion services. The guidelines related to sexual violence state health service's obligation to report to the competent authority for the investigation the fact of the rape in order to protect women victims of violence, but in any case this should not delay or condition in any form the provision of the health care and the abortion. In the 2021 judgement, the Court stated - In no case, may the voluntary interruption of pregnancy be penalized due to the fact that there is no conviction enforceable by the crime of rape. In this regard, this Court considers that such requirement would constitute a requirement that, in practice, would promote motherhood forced of the victims, because while the gestation biologically lasts a limited time, the criminal process goes through a series of stages and has multiple instances that exceed the gestation time. So, for such effects, other options should be considered, such as reporting criminal, medical examination or sworn statement, which must be appropriately regulated by the legislator.

Additional notes

The 2021 judgement gave some guidance on what regulations around permitted abortions in cases of rape should contain. This included the following - in the cases of girls and adolescents who do not have authorization from their legal representative, the competent authorities (health, prosecution, police, judicial, cantonal boards for the protection of rights, ombudsman, among others) will provide adequate and confidential mechanisms so that the abortion may be carried out, before the competent authorities -without hindrance and without fear of retaliation - report, medical exam, affidavit, or whatever corresponds as determined by regulation. This is in order to assist medically and psychologically, in the event of a pregnancy that is not desired and is a product of a violation. These measurements are especially necessary in cases where the violation has been perpetrated within the intimate or family circle of the girl or adolescent, where their perpetrators exercise power over them and may even have their legal representation.
